In Brief

This is a stroll through part of London Dockland, along the River Thames with some of the best views and under Tower Bridge to London Bridge.

Any type of clothing or footwear is fine. Dogs are welcome.

The walk begins at Canada Water Underground / Rail Station, postcode SE16 7PJ. See a tube or overground map for details.

The Walk

- 1 Choose the station exit signed Business Park. This goes up a flight of steps to Surrey Quays Road. Keep ahead along the road, crossing it where you can. In only 100m or so, stay close to the building on your right (Canada Water Dental Health) and you will find that the pavement descends gradually down to the canal. This is known as the Albion Channel and, if you take a peek left under the bridge, you will see part of the beautiful canalside walk that links this area to Surrey Water about 500m away, not on our route however. Turn right along the canal, go over the little bridge and continue on the opposite side. This takes you to the waterside at Canada Water.

Canada Water, part of Rotherhithe, sums up the excitement and optimism of the Dockland developments. The lake is fresh and was once part of the old Canada Dock. The new Jubilee Line station (1999) brought this area only two stops from London Bridge and the result has been a huge expansion of commercial and residential developments, many in a radical architectural style.

Turn left along the waterside, passing several large retail units and turning the corner. After leaving the last superstore, keep ahead through the Shopping Centre car park, going diagonally left until you reach the main tree-lined avenue walkway that comes out of the main entrance. At the end of the walkway, cross a service road to a footpath and go right down steps and left on Hothfield Place. At the end, turn right on Lower Road. In only 100m, opposite a police station, turn left on Gomm Road. (At the time of writing, the street name is missing.) Gomm Road is named after Richard Carr-Gomm, founder of several charities that provide care and housing for underprivileged and lonely people.

- 2 At the end of Gomm Road, go through the massive gates of Southwark Park. The café is on the right and a little way on the left is the Art Gallery which houses worthwhile contemporary exhibitions. There are several routes through this large and varied park. The one described here shows it off well. At the little fingerpost go straight ahead to the lake and turn right and left around it, through the garden and then right and right again. Go over a road and continue along an avenue of plane trees. Turn right to the magnificent band-stand and wheel half-left past it onto a path that leads to the park gate (Paradise Gate) near a roundabout of roads visible ahead. Exit to the busy main road. The church over on the other side of the roundabout, next to the Rotherhithe Tunnel approach, with a Viking ship as a weather vane, is St Olav's Norwegian church, one of several scandinavian churches in this area. Cross the road and enter King's Stairs Gardens. This attractive riverside park is under threat from Thames Water who need the space for a super sewer. Fork immediately left and turn right at the children's play area. The path rises to the King's Steps by the Thames with majestic views of the river. You have the best views of Tower Bridge along this path. The "Gherkin" building is on the north side and the "Shard" at London Bridge, the tallest inhabited building in Western Europe, is on the south side.

3 Turn left along river walk. This walk is part of the Jubilee Greenway and has several terraces from where you obtain closer and closer views of the City, separated by quiet roads. Soon you come to the Angel pub. The terrace just after this contains an especially poignant piece of sculpture Dr Salter's Daydream by Diane Gorvin. Dr Alfred Salter was a local physician and labour politician who campaigned for better health services for the people of Bermondsey, especially for the treatment of TB. His daughter Joyce died in 1910 of scarlet fever. The three-piece sculpture shows Salter as an old man dreaming of sunshine days with Joyce grinning mischievously and the cat prowling along the wall. Continue along another terrace by a narrower road. Soon there is a Thames Path sign pointing left. You need to turn left here down Bevington Street to avoid the building site which is Chambers Wharf. The pub on your left, the Old Justice, was used by Paul McCartney for the film "Give My Regards to Broad Street". Turn right on Chambers Street passing the site. Chambers Wharf is a startlingly ambitious project but visible progress has been slow. At the end, turn right on George Row and left on Bermondsey Wall West. Soon you have sight of the great wharves and millhouses around Butler's Wharf. At the end, you reach Mill Street and one of the little secrets of Docklands.

4 Go straight over Mill Street towards what looks like an untidy yard. On the wall is a finger pointer indicating Riverside Walkway. The rising path curves round and through an arch and goes over an award-winning hydraulic cable stay swing bridge. This shiny bridge takes you into the Pool of London (the ancient port area). This part is New Concordia Wharf and St Saviour's Dock. The murky river here is The Neckinger, supposedly named after the summary treatment meted out to the necks of pirates. This area was also used in the musical film "Oliver!". Nearby on the left shortly is the Design Museum. Continue along the riverside with its large anchors and sculpture, passing many opportunities for nourishment. The ambience will undoubtedly have changed now with hundred of tourists viewing the historic riverside. After Le Pont de la Tour (a superior and rather good restaurant), turn left down a passage, passing the Pont's own food shop. You are in historic Shad Thames criss-crossed by metal bridges that used to link the warehouses, once a Victorian mega warehouse, now a smart area with coffee shops and bars. Turn right along Shad Thames (after looking back at the bridges). On the left, is a small piazza with cheaper coffee shops. One reason for its popularity for photo shots is the water sculpture by Antony Donaldson called Waterfall. No elaboration is needed. Continue along Shad Thames passing under Tower Bridge.

Tower Bridge is a steel raisable bascule bridge with a suspension bridge on each side. (Yes, steel – the stone effect is just a skin.) It was finished in 1894. The bridge is 244m in length and the towers, each standing on a massive pier sunk into the riverbed, are 65m high. There is an exhibition, open daily, on the north west side and visitors can go up to the walkways at the top. On your (south) side there are the engine rooms. You can check on-line for times when the bridge lifts.

- 5 Continue ahead past Potters Field Park, where events often take place, and soon reach a glass building that looks like a motorbike helmet. This is City Hall, home of the Greater London Authority. City Hall is open all day weekdays. Visitors can climb the rotary staircase and look down on the council chamber, rather like in the Reichstag, Berlin. In fact, both buildings were (re-)designed by Norman Foster. City Hall is also a cultural centre. Continuing onwards, you are close to an area of (literally) cutting-edge office developments known as More London, with smart bars and cafés and sculpture. The scooped-out area is known as The Scoop. Next comes the ship HMS Belfast. HMS Belfast is a World-War-II battle cruiser and museum ship operated by the Imperial War Museum. It is open daily to visitors and gives them a vivid experience of life aboard a serving ship. Immediately after the ship, you reach Hays Galleria, a stylish enclosed shopping area. This used to be Hays Wharf until it fell on hard times and was redeveloped to become a major tourist attraction. Turn left through Hays Galleria passing in the centre a large eccentric sculpture The Navigators by David Kemp.

Decision point. Would you like to continue further along the riverside towards Westminster Bridge? If so, follow the next walk in the series, Dazzling South Bank. Otherwise, exit the Galleria as indicated here.

At the far end, exit into Tooley Street, where London Bridge station (underground and rail) is on the right.
